After the United States gained independence from Britain, the young nation was eager to establish its own cultural identity. One of the most important parts of this unique American culture was language. For the newly emerging nation, finding a common identity through language was essential.

Unlike Britain, the United States was a melting pot of languages. Immigrants who settled in the United States spoke English, French, German, Dutch, and a variety of other languages. Immigrants were encouraged to adopt English, and gradually, a unique American English emerged.
